contentQ: Using a Dictionary inside of a Dictionary? I have two collections/lists - Collection1 and Collection2. Collection1 contains Objects that will be added to Collection2. Both of these collections implement a common interface - IList. This is not the issue. My issue arises when I wish to create a Dictionary of Dictionary to check if a Collection1 Object has already been added to Collection2 before I add it. I am using the following code: if (Collection2.Contains(item.ID)) { Collection2.Remove(item.ID); } Collection2.Add(item); The items have unique IDs so this is used to check.
However - I am unsure whether this type of loop will be efficient. I realise that I could just do - var collection = new Dictionary(); collection.Add(item.ID, Collection2); but the question is - will a Dictionary of Dictionary change the performance of the loop above - will it effect the Dictionary so much that it will actually be slower? A: This will depend on what types of Objects are inside Collection1, and what type Collection2 holds. If the objects are generic types which are always the same, and they can be anything, such as this (a List); Collection2.Add(item); Then the performance will be the same as in your first example. If there's a set of types, and each type is different in some way, such as this (a Dictionary): var collection = new
